

A must-read for parents and teachers

Kids' world via screens

MICHELLE DENNIS

Tech-Savvy Parenting – A Guide to Raising Safe Children in a Digital World by Nikki Bush and Arthur Goldstuck, in one of the most informative, educational and interesting books I have read this year.

Nikki Bush, whose name will be familiar to readers of her '21st Parenting column in ZO Woman', is a recognised and revered modern parenting expert. She has also written, Future-proof Your Child and Easy Answers to Awkward Questions.

Arthur Goldstuck is head of the World Wide Worx research organisation that provides the most widely accepted statistics for Internet use.

He is also an award-winning writer, analyst and commentator on Internet, mobile and business and consumer technologies.

The beauty of this collaboration, according to Nikki is, '... this book contains a mix of both mum and dad stuff as well as high-touch parenting insights, combined with high-tech digital speak.'

Digital natives and the immigrants

The book begins by putting it all into perspective. This generation are referred to as the 'digital natives – born with a computer mouse or gaming console on one hand and a cellphone in the other.' The parents are referred to as 'digital immigrants to this strange new world'.

Children, say the authors, have been digitally nurtured and are, therefore, wired for technology.

However, they are still flesh and blood and need human nurturing and face-to-face interactions – especially from their parents. It is also emphasised that nothing can replace 'real-life experiences with real-time consequences'.

Adapt to their world

Like there are rules in the real world, parents have to teach children about the rules, choices and consequences in the digital world.

The bottom line is that we have to adapt to their world, which is always on with information and entertainment available instantly. And the point is made quite strongly that the children's digital lives are, in fact, preparing them for the future workplace.

The book states that an estimated 60% to 70% of future jobs had not yet been invented.

It's the parent's role to teach their children to make safe choices regarding their media usage as there is a dark side where abusive activities are found.

Tipping point reached

A particularly interesting chapter is Chapter 6, 'The Evolution Of Learning', which informs how our schools are lagging behind the changing world and that therefore, the modern child battles to relate to an aged education system which was created 100 years ago during the industrial era.

This review is but the tip of the ice-berg, but as the tipping point of technology overtaking our lives has been reached, it is vital you read this book to become a 'tech-savvy parent'.
